

"A Consensus Conference is a chaired public hearing with an audience from the public and with active participation of 10–15 lay people (sometimes called the jury or the panel) and a corresponding number of different experts. The experts may be from different disciplines and/or from different schools within a discipline. The conference lasts two days for the active participants. The purpose is to produce an informed debate on a limited subject presented in the form of main questions to the conference."

The idea for the consensus conference originated in the USA; it has been used by the NIH (National Institutes of Health). In the USA the consensus conference (development) conference has been used specifically to try to resolve issues of biomedical technology."

The NIH describes the objectives of consensus conferences as :

"NIH Consensus Development Conferences are convened to evaluate available scientific available information and resolve safety and efficacy issues related to biomedical technology. The resultant NIH Consensus Statements are intended to advance understanding of the technology or issue in question and to be useful to health professionals and the public".
